PERSONAL STATEMENT

As a health services researcher and pharmacoepidemiologist, I use an interdisciplinary approach to identify how structural determinants impact the use of healthcare, especially medications among minoritized racial/ethnic populations. My current research focuses on health inequities across immigration status in the Latinx population. Immigration status is a critical yet overlooked factor influencing inequities because noncitizens endure significant barriers to legal and social protections, including systemic exclusions from healthcare. I also conduct research in the fields of drug utilization among historically excluded populations (e.g., racial/ethnic inequities in cancer treatment among older adults), federal policies to mitigate drug risks, and the role of pharmacy accessibility in determining access to medications using electronic health records, administrative claims, surveys, and geospatial data. My unique research perspective has garnered funding from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, as part of their inaugural cohort of Health Policy Research Scholars, and the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute, as a T32 fellow. My research appears in several high impact journals, including JAMA, Health Affairs, and the American Journal of Public Health.
